Liberatory Design Mindsets

The Liberatory Design Mindsets are evolutions of the design mindsets commonly used at the Stanford d.school.

They have been enhanced with the explicit intention of building Liberatory Design leaders through a collaboration between the National Equity Project and the Stanford d.school's K12 Lab.

The goal is to develop the Liberatory Design muscles held within us all. As we build our own muscles, it allows others who work with us to develop the equity-centered creative agency to solve their own problems in community with others.

Tania Anaissie, Victor Cary, David Clifford, Tom Malarkey, Susie Wise

Practice Self-Awareness

Why?

Liberatory Design requires we minimize the harmful effects of our blind spots and maximize the potential for non-oppressive partnerships. Liberatory Design has the potential to change us to the extent we work with humility, curiosity and courage.

How

- Ask yourself, “How am I positioned (relative to privilege and/or oppression) in all aspects of my identities (e.g. race, class, gender, language)?”
- Ask yourself, “How might these identities impact people and our process?”
- Surface what you don’t know. Ask yourself, “What is unfamiliar to me here?”
- Challenge your assumptions.
- Expand your equity consciousness by seeking out new information about privilege and oppression.
In order to create change that empowers communities from the inside-out, we must place users at the center of all our work. They are the experts on the challenges that face their community.

To do this as designers, we must invest in getting to know the community and honor the stories they share with us.

In addition, we must honor human values on our own design teams and make time for emotions.

Focus on Human Values

Why?

In order to create change that empowers communities from the inside-out, we must place users at the center of all our work. They are the experts on the challenges that face their community.

To do this as designers, we must invest in getting to know the community and honor the stories they share with us.

In addition, we must honor human values on our own design teams and make time for emotions.

How

- Listen from a place of love. Be humble and acknowledge that you are not the expert.
- Honor the stories, experiences, and emotions people share with you.
- Stay connected to the community in all phases of the project.
- Engage in collective sense-making.

Recognize Oppression

Why?

The people we are designing with and the challenges they face do not sit in a vacuum. If we are able to see root causes and systemic inequities more clearly, our design work has the potential to address deeper needs. Our design process should build our capacity to recognize oppression at play at individual, institutional, and structural levels.

How

- Ask, “What identity-related patterns and inequities are we seeing in this context?”
- Ask, “What barriers are in the way of achieving equitable outcomes?”
- Ask, “What might be some unintended consequences of our designs?”
- Ask, “What is this community’s experience with ‘design’ and how does that affect how we do this work?”
- Ask, “How are relationships and power differentials affecting the truth that is told here?”

Focus on Human Values

Seek as many ways as possible to get to know your end users including immersion, observation, and co-design.

Recognize Oppression

Our designs depend on how we frame a challenge. So we need a clear “window” to see how oppression may be at play in our context.
Embrace Complexity

Why?
Equity challenges, by their nature, are complex, and moments of ambiguity are common when using the design process.

While it can be uncomfortable not knowing what’s next or not having a clear answer, jumping to a solution out of discomfort risks defaulting to comfortable or reproductive practices.

Wading through the complexity and ambiguity of this kind of work with patience will allow you to develop more innovative and equitable outcomes.

How
- Acknowledge the confusion and discomfort of the uncertainty present in your work.
- Find ways to care for the team and yourself as you wade through the uncertainty.
- Welcome diversity of discourse even when it can feel complicating.

---

Seek Liberatory Collaboration

Why?
Design work is fraught with power and identity dynamics (e.g. designer as expert, who’s generally situated with advantage). To fully realize the liberatory potential of a design process, both for the people we are designing with and for the designer, it’s critical to reframe the relationship as one of partnership.

How
- Actively seek diverse identities and skill sets as you build your team.
- Acknowledge and build from the strengths, stories, and skills of each other.
- Set conditions for collective learning, risk-taking, and action.
- When framing the question, “How Might We...?” ensure the “We” is diverse and inclusive.
Build Relational Trust

Why?
Relational trust is the glue in equity-centered design work. When working across difference on difficult challenges, teams must invest in developing emotional trust in order to authentically collaborate.

If we are comfortable identifying and processing emotions with our team, we create opportunities for healing and prevent distortion of our work.

How
• Enable personal connections through pair-shares (people share what matters to them).
• Make time and space for people to bring forward their fuller selves and identities.
• Emphasize the importance of non-judgmental listening.
• Hold space for community to reflect, express and process thoughts and emotions.
• Create culture that invites dialogue.

Bias Towards Experimentation

Why?
Oppression thrives on risk-averse behavior. It’s important to fail fast. Small changes can have large effects - AND hacking oppression requires longshots. Liberatory Design is an ever-evolving craft that is never “done.”

How
• Co-design safe-to-fail experiments to learn more.
• Build trust through experiments increasing in scale or risk over time.
• Build agency and capacity in the community through co-designed and implemented experiments.
• Balance quick action with thoughtful reflection.
• Choose a direction, not a single or final solution.
Share, Don’t Sell

Practice transparency of process and non-attachment to ideas.

Why?
When sharing your work, find ways to invite people in instead of trying to convince them of value. When you share your work humbly, it invites feedback and questions that could advance your work. In addition, it widens your circle of collaborators and invites those people to co-design with you.

Conversely, if we focus on selling or convincing, we are losing opportunities to refine our work and incorporate new perspectives.

How
• Be transparent about the team’s process, mindsets, shared goals, expectations and co-constructed narratives.
• Share as an opportunity to learn and grow.
• Earn trust through actions and not just words.

Attend to Healing

Doing equity work includes on-going healing from the effects of oppression to increase our agency for liberatory design.

Why?
We must attend to healing both from past and current traumas to be able to stay in this work, engender a sense of well-being, collaborate in truly liberatory ways, and build authentic relationships. Status quo culture pressures us to be constantly executing, working through pain and discomfort in order to be efficient and productive. We believe this brings toxicity into teams and fuels inequitable work. We instead believe that healing is a critical element of this work. We also acknowledge that healing is a never-ending state of being and not something to be “resolved.”

How
• Establish protocols for how to name when someone is feeling pain or there is opportunity for healing.
• Identify regular methods to practice healing in group and private settings (poetry, check-ins, somatic body work, work retreats, mental health support, etc).
• Include time and space for healing in all project planning timelines.
• Explore existing frameworks for managing conflict equitably, for example restorative justice practices.
Exercise Your Creative Courage

Why?
We believe that everyone is creative. Further, we believe all humans are designers, intentionally or not. Status quo culture tells us only a select few are born creative and others of us are not, nor will ever be.

Creativity is fundamental to equity and liberation. We need to imagine possibilities beyond the confines of dominant culture. And, since joy, connection and healing flow from creative experiences, we must make creative expression part of our collaborative processes.

How
• Collectively define what design or creativity means (looks like, feels like, lives like) to your organization/team.
• Invite wild ideas and celebrate the mistakes that come with actually trying them, publicly.
• Notice and affirm creative moves by your collaborators.
• Leadership models creative approaches to a problem.
• Listen with a curious heart, not critical. The results will astound you.

Catalyze Opportunities to Transform Power

Why?
Transforming power allows our teams to contribute authentically and challenge inequity when it manifests in the work or on the team. Power structures shape aspects of our identity and role, and our relative positions can often impede collaboration or replicate inequity when not addressed. Opportunities to transform power:

Process:
Who’s designing (choices around co-design)?
How do we address power within the design group (internal practices)?
How does the design group engages with those impacted (external practices)?

Product:
Do our designs serve to transform power?

How
• Reflect on identities and roles across the team. Discuss potential power imbalances that would occur in various situations. How might they manifest in our processes?
• Build a strategy to transform power in conversations, decision-making, presentations, etc.
• Build shared protocols to name and intercept power imbalances in action as soon as they manifest.
• Notice and discuss power in both it’s earned and unearned manifestations based on what our society values.
Work with Our Fear and Discomfort

Why?

Working in emergent ways on high-stakes challenges of inequity can be stressful. The fear and discomfort we feel is an anticipated part of the Liberatory Design process. It signals to us that there are aspects of our work that are unresolved.

Note, there is a difference between discomfort that arises from the complexity of the challenge and its unknown direction and the discomfort that arises from inequitable dynamics or structures. The first can be a source of growth and creativity while the latter can be destructive and should be addressed. Refer to “Attend to Healing” in that case to release emotions and work towards well-being.

How

• Give space to process and accept that it is present.
• Name the fear or discomfort and discuss what the sources of it might be: lack of clarity? How we’re working? A conflict?
• Establish protocols for how to name fear and discomfort and explore their sources as a team.
• Reflect on why it’s occurring and if it’s a productive moment of fear/discomfort or if it’s becoming unproductive and we need to alleviate it.

Credits + an Invitation

Thank you, team!

Thank you to the wonderful people who put love, brain power, and intention into the making of this card deck (alphabetically):

Tania Anaissie (Content + Visual Design)
Victor Cary (Content)
David Clifford (Content + Illustrations)
Tom Malarkey (Content)
Susie Wise (Content)

We Want to Hear From You

This card deck is a work in progress. This is our first prototype of it, and we’d love to hear your feedback! What do you like about it? What do you wish was different about it? Any new ideas? Do you use it at work? Why or why not?

Email us at liberatorydesign@gmail.com